5 The moment Aldrick stepped outside, Carnival hit him. And his heart grew big, and he felt a softness flow over him, and on the street, the steelband and masqueraders were assembling. The months of practising and sewing and painting and building were flowing together in the stillness of the morning under the eyes of women and children who had awakened from sleep and dressed hurriedly to come out and watch their band, to see their people, to admire them and cheer them and to accompany them, to tramp the pavement, while the masqueraders occupied the street, as a sort of guard, right into Port of Spain.

10 It hit him, the red and black and gold and green, the colours and the feathers and the satin, and the people's faces with that look in their eyes, and the smell of cologne and face powder, and the smell of grease and the look of wonder on the children's faces, and the little fellows with sailors caps on; and what reverence and what awe as they alone in the whole world had the real eyes to see the real thing, to see heroes, to see giants, to see gods.

15 And watching, fascinated by it all, as if he were seeing with the boys' eyes, Aldrick felt a tallness and a pride, felt his hair rise on his head. And eyes brimming with furious tears, Aldrick felt again the fierce love and hope that he had doubted in himself, felt again a sense of mission: felt that yes, there was a place here for him, that there was something to say yes to, and people before whom and on whose behalf he could dance the dragon. With a strong, piercing scream, he stepped into the street, his chains rattling, his arms outflung, his head lolling, in a slow threatening dance of the Beast, so that the people of the Hill turned to him, recognizing him, said "Yes! Items 37-44

Instructions: Read the following extract carefully and then answer items 37-44 on the basis of what is stated or implied.

When the traditional family unit is discussed, it is usually in terms of the external social changes that are threatening its existence as an institution. Little thought is given to the internal problems of normal homes. The central problem for most family members is, of course, how to get along with each other. This internal matter is not without its external implications; for only where there are orderly and peaceful families can there be an orderly and peaceful society.

Of all the social changes that have affected the family in recent years, by far the most significant has been the increase in the number of mothers of school-age children who have taken outside employment. In Canada, some 75 per cent of women in this category now have full-time or part-time jobs. For the most part, economic imperatives have left women no choice but to work for money. An income sufficient to maintain an average family style took one Canadian 48 hours a week to earn in the 1950s. It takes two people 65 to 75 hours a week to earn that today.

The conflicts between work and family life and scarcity of time to devote to children have taken a personal toll on women in the form of stress and depression. Obviously, individuals under stress are harder to deal with than those who are not, so the tensions of work are carried over into tensions in mother-child relationships. Men, too, report feeling "stressed out" and squeezed between work and family obligations. Males raised in the tradition of mothers doing everything in the home are inclined to be lax in doing housework and awkward in the unaccustomed role of actively nurturing children. But if a two-income family is to run smoothly and fairly, the household workload must be shared.

Another profound change in family relationships lies in the relatively high incidence of divorce and marital separations in western society. The fact that so many couples feel they must go their separate ways illustrates just how difficult it is for people to live together satisfactorily at the best of times.

37. According to paragraph 1 (lines 1-5), which of the following results from conflict between family members?

- (A) Disorder in societies
- (B) Anxious parents and children
- (C) Disruptive behaviour in homes
- (D) High levels of tension between parents

- (A) the high divorce rate in western society
- (B) problems family members experience in getting along
- (C) conflicts between employers and working parents
- (D) the increase in the number of mothers of school age children working outside of the home

39. The word that is CLOSEST in meaning to "imperatives" (line 9) is
- (A) concerns
 - (B) matters
 - (C) demands
 - (D) guidelines
40. In paragraph 2 (lines 6–11), the writer compares income in the 1950s to income today to show that
- (A) people earned more in the 1950s than today
 - (B) a single income cannot adequately support an average family
 - (C) people today do not work as hard as people in the 1950s
 - (D) people today work longer hours for the same pay as in the 1950s

Items 45-54

Instructions: Read the following passage carefully and then answer items 45-54 on the basis of what is stated or implied.

Dear Mr Lopez:

I strongly believe that our school should organize a girls' soccer team, and I am not alone in this belief. After conducting a survey among the junior and senior girls at our school, I found that fifty girls 5 would be interested in trying out for a soccer team.

To discover how similar teams have worked out at other schools, I have talked to Ms. Young, the girls' soccer coach at Fairfax High. When I asked her how the team has benefited the girls and the school, she said: "The girls
10 on my team have become close friends. They help each other with everything - homework, personal problems." She added, "Their grades have improved - they've become better all-round students and that's always good for a school."

15 A soccer team would be of equal benefit to all the girls at our school. Just like the girls at Fairfax, many girls here have trouble making friends. A soccer team might help them adjust to school life.

Moreover, it would be simple to start a soccer team. I've 20 already talked to my fellow gym teacher, Ms Jordan. She is willing to take on the responsibility of coaching the team. The question of where to practise isn't a problem either, since the playing field isn't used after three o'clock on Tuesdays and Thursdays. All that is needed is
